Each individual seeking art therapy is capable of healing themselves with appropriate care and supportive services; this belief underscores Madoka Urhausen's, LMFT, ATR-BC, practice. Known as "Mado" in the LA community, as both artist and art therapist, she has been engaging in a process of personal meaning making through art since childhood back in Japan. "Art and nature has always offered me refuge to dark or confusing moments of going through loss and grief, dealing with a sense of displacement and marginalization, and any other challenges in life. If I gave myself a chance to engage with myself in this potent realm it never failed to provide me with an opportunity to re-emerge with the courage to be me again." READ MORE

The distinctive role of art therapy for people affected by early relational trauma

The British Association of Art Therapists

Since our first Mental Health Awareness Week in 2000 we have helped generate public debates around how anxiety, sleep deprivation and exercise can impact our mental health. In 2016 we are talking about relationships. We believe we urgently need a greater focus on the quality of our relationships. We need to understand just how fundamental relationships are to our health and wellbeing. We cannot flourish as individuals and communities without them. In fact, they are as vital as better-established lifestyle factors, such as eating well, exercising more and stopping smoking. READ MORE
