Ontario's rules and regulations for road-building machines have changed. This change affects the way road-building machines are legally defined and classified. Vehicles no longer considered road-building machines will be subject to requirements related to registration, licensing and hours of service.

New Definition of Road-Building Machine

Per the changes to Ontario Regulation 398/16, road-building machines will be defined as self-propelled vehicles commonly used in the construction or maintenance of highways. Additionally, road-building machines will now be designated as slow-moving vehicles and are subject to Section 76 of the Highway Traffic Act and Regulation 616 (Slow Moving Vehicle Sign). Because the new regulation alters definitions, some vehicles no longer are considered road-building machines.

New Requirements for Former Road-Building Machines

Distinguishing between commercial motor vehicles and road-building machines is important, as former road-building machines will now be subject to requirements related to the following:

- Vehicle registration and motor vehicle insurance
- Licensed driver/appropriate class of driver's licence
- Required CVOR certificate
- Hours of service
- Inspections
